

China 2010 - Year in Review:

This week we take a look back at China in 2010, revisiting some of the biggest stories we covered, and discussing a few we missed. With Kaiser Kuo hosting the discussion as usual, our guests in the studio include Sinica stalwarts and regulars Jeremy Goldkorn and Gady Epstein of Danwei and Forbes fame respectively. Also contributing her insight is Li Xin, English editor at Caixin, the leading independent business journal in China.

Need another excuse to listen? This week we're pleased to add a new feature to Sinica, a short summary of the week's economic and business news courtesy of the journalists at Caixin. Topics covered this week's briefing include signs of political conflict over China's coming property tax, the 700-billion RMB expansion of China's railroad network, the specter of slow growth in China's manufacturing sector, and the burgeoning threat of inflation in China.

And before you listen, let us remind you as always: the easiest way to listen to Sinica each week is to subscribe via RSS in iTunes. You can do this by creating an account on Popup Chinese and customizing your feed settings to include the show. Alternately, open iTunes and select the option "Subscribe to Podcast" from the Advanced menu. Copy the URL <http://popupchinese.com/feeds/custom/sinica> into the box when prompted. Or download this and all of our other shows directly from Popup Chinese as a standalone mp3 file. And Happy New Year!